INTRODUCTION

AMERICAN armies advancing through Germany in the spring of 1945 discovered in a salt mine at Merkers a cache of important pictures from the Berlin museums. Although the cache represented only a small portion of the collection of the Kaiser-Friedrich-Museum, Berlin, it included some of the world's great masterpieces and the group may be said to represent the cream of one of the world's great collections of the old masters. Also included in the cache were two masterpieces from the National-Galerie, Berlin, the museum devoted to the art of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

This group of paintings was brought to the United States for safekeeping on the Army transport James Parker in December, 1945, and deposited by the Department of the Army in the vaults of the National Gallery of Art in Washington, D. C.

In the spring of 1948 General Lucius D. Clay, United States Military Governor of Germany, reported that safe storage facilities had been made available in the American zone of occupation and that the paintings could be returned to Germany to be held there in the custody of American authorities pending the final peace settlement.

By a decision of the Department of the Army, the paintings which, because of age and fragility could not be subjected to the risks of further travel, were returned in the spring of 1948 to Germany; but the remainder were made available, under the supervision of the Army, for exhibition in a certain number of American museums in the principal regions of the country, the proceeds from the exhibition to go to the German Children's Relief Fund administered by the American authorities in Germany.

This in brief is the history of the remarkable group of pictures represented in this book. The two pictures from the National-Galerie are Don Quixote by Honoré Daumier and The Greenhouse by Édouard Manet; all the remainder are from the collection of the Kaiser-Friedrich-Museum.

CATALOGUE

All the paintings in the exhibition come from the Kaiser-Friedrich-Museum, Berlin, except those by Daumier and Manet, which come from the National-Galerie, Berlin. The information for the captions was taken from recent catalogues of these museums. Sizes in inches have been added.
